

Cold email is right around the corner, so it's time to write six sequences (two per niche).

As you can probably guess, each sequence will use one of the core offers we developed earlier.

Since we're going to run two per niche, we're going to get to test their effectiveness against each other. This is free data—you should always be testing different approaches during cold email, because the time is going to pass anyway, and you might as well walk away knowing more about your audience.

How to write a sequence

I follow a simple copywriting formula on almost all of my campaigns:

- Personalization.
- Who am I and why am I reaching out?
- Why am I worth trusting?
- Offer.

Here's an example of all of the pieces put together:

{{personalization}}

I work with X Live Chat. I know you're currently using live chat for your inquiries and I was wondering if you wanted to make a little more money.

The pitch: we're ~1/3 the cost of your current provider, along with significantly faster response times and quality (our avg law firm does over $150K per month in bookings for a fee of less than 3%). We don't charge anything until you get your first 10 paying clients so it's risk-free. I'd pay for, and set it up, all on my own in under 15 minutes.

Is this worth a chat? If you're not totally satisfied you can always switch back, we'll handle it all for you. Let me know.

Thanks for your time,
X

Sent from my iPhone

Personalization

This starts off every email because of how high leverage it is. Clients see your personalization, think "wow—this person did their research", and it buys you enough time to finish the rest of your pitch.

Campaigns that don't have personalization tend to suck, so make sure you have it!

Who am I?

This is really the "copywriting" part of your cold email, and is where good writers shine and poor writers hurt themselves. But you can simplify this further:

- Say something like "I work with [company]. We do [high value thing], and I was wondering if you wanted [cool outcome]."

- Then, provide social proof, like "I just did [amazing social proof] for [other company], and they're really similar to yours, which makes me confident this is worth your time."

For instance:

"I work with LeftClick. We book ~20 qualified sales appointments per month for recruitment agencies, and I was wondering if you wanted some free leads (I have a lot I can send you!)"

Why am I worth trusting?

Here you provide some proof that you're good at what you do. Some reason why the reader might trust you. You can tie this directly to some authority you've worked with or have association to (e.g big companies like Microsoft) or cite direct results for other people that have taken you up on this offer (e.g "I made $X for Y person").

For instance:

"We just finished a campaign for RecruitmentPros that made them $143,503 in two months. From what I can tell, your businesses are similar, which makes me confident this is worth your time."

Offer

Last but not least, your offer. Since you already did the heavy lifting by writing six offers already, you'll simply have to adapt this slightly to context.

Once you're done, make sure you sign off with a brief, casual signature, and you're good to go.

Subject lines

My subject lines are usually very simple—"{{firstName}}, question" or similar. Sometimes I just send "{{firstName}}?" You're free to experiment with this as you wish. My prevailing principle is do whatever it takes to get them to open the email, even if it's "hacky". Plausible deniability is your friend.

Follow-ups

For your first few sequences, don't go crazy with follow-ups. I recommend you stick to two emails total—the first one (with your offer), and then one casual, short reminder that seems as if it was written by a real person.

Here's an example of a follow-up. Notice how I make use of bullet points to make the email seem shorter. I also tend to re-state most of my first email here (in case they missed it).

Subject Leave empty to use previous step's subject

 Preview

Hey {{firstName}},

Checking in, just in case you haven't seen this. Cliffs notes:

- I want to make a project management system for {{companyName}}. Probably in ClickUp or Monday.com. Goal would be to automate all of your creative, copy, articles, ads, etc.
- I did this for my own company (1SecondCopy) and scaled revenue to $92K/mo @ ~50% margins so I know what I'm talking about!
- Would this make sense for you? If so I can do it right now. I know this is blunt but in my experience you have to show a bit of value before people are willing to work with you.

Can also call if you want (just send me a time). If you're not sure who I am or are skeptical please Google me.

Thanks for the time,
Nick

Sent from my iPhone

Here's another. I don't recommend having more than one followup until you're clear your campaign is working (because otherwise you're just increasing the likelihood that your reader will mark you as spam). But once you've run a campaign for a week or so and verified your reply rate is reasonable, say 2% or higher, you can add additional ones.

This is an example of a "final followup" in my sequence, where I let them know this is it.

Subject Leave empty to use previous step's subject

 Preview

Hi {{firstName}},

Thought I'd reach out one last time. No pressure if this is something you're not into at the moment.

If you ever change your mind, please let me know. Appreciate the time.

Thanks,
Nick

Just make sure that, however you follow up, it seems like you wrote it yourself (ideally on your phone), since that increases the likelihood of a response.

Schedule

I like Monday-Saturday 7:00am-7:00pm ET. This depends on where you're selling to, though.

Add to your cold email platform of choice

Once you've finished your sequences, add them to your cold email platform. Make sure to strip HTML/check formatting/do any other platform-specific things you have to in order to make them look good before moving on.